

University of Saskatchewan
Department of English
Ph.D. Field Examination

Ph.D. candidates take this examination to establish that they have sufficient understanding to do advanced research and teaching in a specific field.

Field examinations are conducted twice yearly: in October and May. At least four months before examination, students must inform the Graduate Chair in writing of their intention to sit the examination.

Ph.D. students are to take this examination in May of the second year of the program or October of the third. The examination will be set and marked by three faculty specialists in the area that has been chosen by the candidate.

The following lists comprise the areas in which the Department of English has set readings for Ph.D. candidates: American, Commonwealth/Postcolonial, English-Canadian, Literary Theory, Literature by Women, Medieval, Modern British, Nineteenth-Century British, Renaissance, and Restoration/Eighteenth Century. Each candidate is either to select one of the areas listed here or to propose an examination in an area for which a list is not already set. The set lists themselves are not exhaustive; each is to be taken as two-thirds of the reading to be undertaken for the examination, the final third to be drafted by the candidate in consultation with the supervisor. At least three months before examination, this list will be submitted to the candidate's Examining Committee for approval.

A candidate may choose to be examined in an area for which there is no list. Should this option be chosen, the candidate (in consultation with the supervisor) will propose an area to the Graduate Committee at least six months before the examination is to be taken. If the Graduate Committee accepts the proposal and if three faculty members are willing to serve as examiners, the candidate (in consultation with the supervisor) will prepare a reading list comparable in dimensions to those in areas for which set lists exist. At least three months before the examination is to be taken, this reading list is to be submitted to the Examining Committee for approval.

The candidate may write the examination either on one day (9:00-12:00, 1:30-5:00) or in two three-hour blocks on successive days. No less than a week and no more than two weeks after writing this examination, the candidate will attend an oral examination of no more than two hours' duration. This oral examination will be convened by the Graduate Chair, and conducted by the three faculty examiners who set the written portion. In this oral examination, special attention will be paid to the candidate's own contributions to the reading list, especially as they relate to the candidate's dissertation topic.

The written and oral components of the Ph.D. Field Examination are of equal value, and a composite grade is given. The grade will be given as one of the three following: Pass with Distinction, Pass, and Fail. If a Fail is given, the candidate must take the examination at the next time scheduled. If repetition of the examination is necessary, usually both the written and oral parts are required; the examining committee has discretion to require, however, that only the oral be retaken.

LITERATURE BY WOMEN

Literature by Women Field Examination

This exam covers the field of Literature by Women in English, which is conceived broadly to include a variety of literary forms, time periods, and geographical locations. Use the exam lists as an opportunity to read widely and deeply to prepare yourself as a teacher-scholar or other professional in this field. The faculty specialists in the area have devised several reading lists from which to choose, and you will contribute an additional part related to your own research.

1. Read the theoretical selections related to feminism, gender, and literature in List A.
2. Read all or the majority of texts in two or three of Lists B-J. You will focus on lists that are related to your area of research, and that are connected to one another by time period and/or geographic location: for example, the Medieval, Renaissance, and Restoration and Eighteenth Century lists, or the Twentieth-Century British, American, and Canadian lists, etc. You should be reading approximately 65-75 texts/authors in this section of the exam; please note that a few poems by one author do not qualify as one text. Read the contextual works to situate your study within the field, and use the anthologies as source texts and/or starting points for the authors listed.
3. Compose your own portion of the reading list; include the primary and critical texts related to your dissertation topic plus cultural, historical, biographical, and/or political materials that will contextualize your specific area of study (approximately 25-35 works in total; your entire list should consist of about 100 works). Consult closely with your supervisor, who in turn will consult the other specialists in the Department.
